Collection CAE1503

Introduction/Abstract

William Binzen created singular images to accompany his Desert Siteworks project from 1992-1994. Desert Siteworks was a summer solstice celebration held annually before Burning Man. Materials include color photographs and backstories to each one, video, and printed ephemera.

Biographical Note: William Binzen

William Binzen received his MFA from the San Francisco Art Institute, and has produced a variety of portfolios using 8 x 10, medium format and 35mm film; Polaroid, digital and plastic cameras. William lives in the Marin hills of northern California, where he divides his time between photography and creating layered musical compositions based on improvisation.

Scope and Content

Binzen, along with John Law and Kevin Evans from the San Francisco Cacophony Society, convinced Burning Man co-founder Larry Harvey to move his event to the Black Rock playa in 1990 when Harvey and company were barred from using Baker Beach in the city for the gathering. Binzen knew that local ceramicist John Bogard and friends played giant croquet during the summer using pickup trucks as mallets, and believed that Harvey could bring the sculpture out to the desert to burn without being bothered by law enforcement. Binzen was also instrumental in later helping to make art a major focus of Burning Man, bringing his architectonic sculpture, "Desert House," to the playa in 1992, where it served as the predecessor of the Central Camp.

Binzen created singular medium-format, double exposure images of his Desert Siteworks project from 1992-1994. His intent was to make magical realist images that communicated a deeper reality about the feeling and spirit of the event. Desert Siteworks was a summer solstice celebration held annually before Burning Man. The event was performance and installation-based, its 15-20 participants engaging in ritual role-playing, meditative exercises, and group art projects. This was an early iteration of the "intentional community," which became a basic tenet of Burning Man.

Materials include color photographs from the Desert Siteworks series, which include backstories to each one, video, and printed ephemera.
